Our characterization of the silicon revealed that several different shapes on a rotating disk could simultaneously be discriminated and that position exceeded at least one of the object chip.

We report progress in the construction and characterization of an event-based biomimetic vision system (CAVIAAR) that learn to classify spatio-temporal features.